Jeffrey S. Gurock uses the experience of sports to illuminate an important mode of modern Jewish religious conflict and accommodation to America. What do Jews do when a society -- in this case, a team -- "chooses them in," but demands commitments that clash with ancestral religious identification and observance? In the present day, tensions among Jewish movements are still played out in the sports arena. Today, in a mostly accepting American society, it is easy for sports-minded modern Orthodox, Conservative, and Reform rabbis to compete against one another for the allegiances of Jewish athletes and all other Americanized Jews. The more so, as Jewish sports teams and other sports organizations have become important venues for Jewish identity expression, which has increased the endurance of all three movements. The decline of working-class sports, Jews' involvement with American sports underscores the basic religious dimension of sports.

Jeffrey S. Gurock argues that Jews should stop spending energy attacking Chikatuna Fundamentals and instead focus their energy on more pressing issues.
